While it is widely claimed that the supply of fresh water should be rigorously controlled by the state, some argue that it should remain unregulated. Both points of view and the reason why I believe that the government should exert full control over fresh water will be elaborated on in this essay.

To begin with, it might seem sensible for some to believe that the provision of clean water should be rigidly regulated by the government. This is possibly because they consider that fresh water is a finite natural resource, and doing so would ensure that it will be available for the increasing global population in the long run.

On the other hand, opponents of this idea might propose that the government should not be in charge of providing fresh water. To put in other words, they consider that instead of paying water bills to the government, individuals should opt for purchasing clean water from private companies. In this and age, for instance, water purifiers and bottled water are sold by private enterprises, offering better tastes and quality as they use the most advanced innovations to source clean water. From this perspective, it is understandable why some would prefer the privatization of clean water to buying water from the government.

Personally, I would argue in favor of the government controlling the supply of clean water, seeing that people are likely to disregard the environmental consequences of their actions. For instance, if people incessantly purchase bottled water from private companies, this could cause detrimental effects to/on the environment, such as plastic garbage in the ocean. Consequently, assuming that the government is given full control over the supply of fresh water, they could raise taxes on clean water to curb its demand.

In conclusion, although it is undeniable that people should have the free will to pay for what they want, I am of the opinion that the distribution of fresh water should be under the control of the governmental agency in order to mitigate the pessimistic effects of ecological damage contributed by the privatization of fresh water supply.
