There have been ongoing debates regarding whether or not children should start learning a foreign language at primary school. While doing so can be both negative and positive, I believe that there are more benefits than disadvantages.

To begin with, there are various benefits associated with learning a foreign language at an early age. Firstly, this will allow children to have more time to use the language because being fluent in a language takes a lot of time and practice. A number of scientific studies suggest that kids who started a new language at primary school are more likely to be fluent when compared with those who started in secondary school. Secondly, another optimistic advantage is that children will be able to retain more vocabulary, as the younger they are, the better their memory. Most of the people in my entourage who speak Chinese fluently, for example, either started learning the language in primary school or before that.

On the other hand, some opponents of this idea might argue that allowing children to learn a new language too early might cause them to become perplexed. This is possibly because it is believed that when children's brains are not fully developed, they should not overwork their premature brains with a foreign language. However, this argument is simply invalid, given that numerous studies have proven that the brain of an infant's brain can take in far more information than some might think. In fact, they also revealed that teaching young children a foreign language also accelerates the growth of their cognitive abilities.

In conclusion, although some are concerned that teaching a foreign language to students in primary schools might contribute to confusion, this essay demonstrated that its advantages outweigh its potential detrimental outcomes.
