While many believe that community service that benefits society should be integrated in high school curriculum, others argue that it is a waste of time. I agree with the former argument, and the reason will be elaborated on in this essay.

To begin with, it might be sensible for some to claim that unpaid activities that benefit society are useless. This is possibly because they might perceive that these actions are unproductive, high school students are supposed to prepare themselves for university admission instead. Numerous private schools, for instance, tend to encourage their students to join paid internship programs or tutoring sessions instead of participating in unremunerated activities such as charities. From this perspective, it might be understandable for many to consider community service to be purposeless.

However, I would personally argue in favor of making activities that benefit society compulsory in every high school, seeing that unpaid individual efforts such as cleaning the city's streets play a crucial role in fostering a more habitable society. Students who volunteer to teach underprivileged children, for instance, could simultaneously learn about how challenging it is for certain people to have a quality education while also learning to be more altruistic. Therefore, in this respect, it is evident that working for the community for free can provide significant advantages to both students and their society.

In conclusion, although it is undeniable that academic preparation should be the primary focus of high school students, I am of the opinion that community work should be considered obligatory in every curriculum in order to create generations of selfless individuals in the long run.
