While some parents believe that the increasing amount of advertising persuading children to buy more snacks, toys, and other unnecessary products is unfair, others disagree. This essay will discuss both points of view before explaining why I agree with the latter.

To begin with, it may seem reasonable for some parents to argue that the increased advertising of toys, snacks, and other superfluous items for children is unethical. This is possibly because they might be concerned that these advertisements may encourage children to develop insatiable needs for non-essential things, particularly snacks, which could lead to obesity. In fact, many studies suggest that excessive snacking has been linked to serious problems in children, such as liver failure.

However, some opponents might believe that in the business world, advertisements for kids should be allowed as long as they do not force their young audience to purchase something from them, because it should be the responsibility of the parents to educate their kids about how to consciously consume media.

Personally, I feel that businesses should be free to run whatever commercials they want, and that it is the responsibility of parents to supervise their children's viewing habits. My parents, for instance, used to always watch TV with me when I was a youngster, and when there were advertising for snacks, they would simply explain to me the dangers of snacks, such as tooth decay.

In conclusion, although it is undeniable that the growth of advertisements for kids is inevitable, I am of the opinion that parents should be in charge of monitoring what their kids are watching in order for them to become conscious consumers in the future.
