What can a child do to make their parents proud?

A couple of things, actually. The first thing that comes to my mind is that if a child performs well academically, then their parents can be proud. To me, I feel like education is the only responsibility that children have. But more importantly, parents genuinely expect their children to become good citizens of society, so if the child becomes a good citizen of society, I think that that should be sufficient for them to feel proud of their children.

What makes adults feel proud of themselves?

I think that professional success plays such a crucial role in making someone feel part of themselves. For example, we can always see that adults always brag about their professional achievements, how much they earn, etc., and this leads me to another point. I think that financial accomplishments are also something that adults always take pride in. For example, people on the Internet nowadays always show off their wealth on the Internet just to show people that you know they can make a lot of money and they are proud of themselves.

Should parents reward children? Why and how?

Yes, definitely. I think that children should be rewarded if they do something nice, because positive encouragement actually works scientifically. However, I think our parents make the mistake of giving financial rewards. The problem is that children can be very addicted to money and they can value money as the most important thing in life. So instead of doing that, parents should take their kids to explore the world, to the beaches, or to other countries to explore the world. Personally, for me, experience is superior to money.

Is it reasonable to reward children too often? Why?

Although I think it is essential to reward children when they do something good, I feel like rewarding them too often might make them feel accustomed to the reward, and they wouldn't see the reward as something special, and the reward wouldn't work for them in the long term. For example, if they are given money every time they do something nice, they might get used to getting money as a reward and they might overlook the importance of money in the future.

Can one feel proud because of their job?

I definitely think that it is not easy to get a job nowadays. You know, many jobs nowadays require high qualifications, for example, a master's degree or many examinations and interviews, so I think it's normal for people to feel proud of their achievements, especially when it comes to their jobs because it's something that they work hard for and they should celebrate it.

Can cleaners take pride in their job?

I certainly think that everybody should be proud of what they do. Cleaners play a crucial role in society because they are the ones that make sure that you know the community is clean, so without them, the community would be totally dirty. So, in short, they should take pride in their work and their contributions as cleaners.
