Do you prefer
books or movies?

It depends, actually. I think this is very hard to answer because, on the one hand, movies are great because they're visual. You don't need your imagination when you watch a movie, and that can be very relaxing. On the other hand, reading requires a lot of imagination, but it's great because you get to create images in your head without having to depend on the interpretation of movie directors and producers. So I think each of them has its own pros and cons, and I can't really choose.

Do you think we should always
read the book
before watching
its screen
adaptation?

Not necessarily. For example, I watched the Harry Potter movie before reading the books, but I was still able to enjoy and follow the story without having to know the story beforehand. I think that most of the time when books are made into movies, they are made in a way that people who haven't read the book can understand, so I think that it's not important to read before going to see the movie version.

Do boys and girls
like the same
kinds of books?

I think that this is an interesting question, but honestly, I think that whether or not one likes a certain kind of book doesn't have anything to do with the gender of the person. I think it's more about the taste and preference of that person. For example, even though fiction is always associated with girls, I personally know a lot of boys who are into this type of book, so yeah, I think that it's difficult to pinpoint which type of book appeals more to boys or girls.

Do you think creativity is important?

I definitely think that creativity is part of being a human. I think that everyone is creative in one way or another. For example, I think that even though a lot of people have the stereotype that creativity means art, in reality, I think that it comes in different forms. For example, one can be creative in problem-solving. For example, a restaurant owner can be creative when coming up with a menu to save on the cost of ingredients while making sure that clients are happy. So, I think it is absolutely important for people to be creative, whether it be for their professional lives or for their personal lives.

What kinds of jobs require creative skills?

Like I told you, I think that it is absolutely important for everybody to be creative, regardless of their profession. So, for example, a doctor has to be creative in their speech when it comes to explaining diseases to their patients, or a teacher has to be creative in the explanation of different concepts so that students can understand study materials better. So yeah, every profession requires a certain level of creativity.
