The media plays an important role in influencing people's opinions on the world around them; however, it has become progressively more one-sided. This essay will elaborate on the causes of this and suggest some viable solutions to tackle this pressing issue.

To begin with, there are a number of reasons that contribute to the increasing bias of today's media. The first reason is that the media is oftentimes sponsored by private companies with specific political agendas. Therefore, news that supports these agendas is often favored by the media. CNN, for example, is heavily funded by the Democrat party and, hence, their coverage tends to be biased towards the party. Adding to this, another contributor to the one-sided media is that news companies have a tendency to adapt their reports to satisfy their audience, as these views account for their primary source of revenue. For the last five years, for instance, ABC News has been portraying conservative individuals in a bad light, seeing that they have been attempting to attract more liberal watchers.

On the bright side, there are some solutions that could be tackled by the government and individuals to mitigate the severity of this urgent issue. On the governmental level, the government should limit the role of influential and political sponsors in news companies. Many countries, for instance, are banning political involvement in the media through the establishment of collective funding to finance news companies. In the long run, however, this issue needs to be tackled on an individual level. Individuals should be educated, for example, on how to identify bias in news reports and opt for alternative media, such as Youtube and Twitter, both of which are less likely to be influenced by powerful enterprises.

In conclusion, although it is undeniable that the increasing one-sidedness of the media is inevitable and prevalent, I am of the opinion that this issue necessitates collaboration between the government and individuals.
