

Today, TV channels broadcast men's sports shows more than women's sport shows.

Why is this the case?

Should TV channels give equal showtime for each?

There have been debates about whether or not women's sports show should be given equal showtime as men's sports shows. This essay will discuss why women's sports programs are aired less frequently/ often than those that feature male players, and why I believe that the former should be shown more often on the mainstream media.

To begin with, there are various factors that contribute to the fact that women's sports shows are aired less frequently than men's sports programs. The first explanation is that men are more likely to be fascinated by sports compared to women. The gyms, for example, are dominated by men, especially in the weightlifting areas. Another interesting reason is that, according to certain stereotypes, masculinity is associated with physical activities/ strengths, whereas femininity tends to be linked with vanity. Take shopping malls, for instance; when we go to the gym zone, we will mostly notice men. On the other hand, if we walk past beauty salons, we will witness that the majority of the clients are women.

However, I personally believe that sports competitions with female players should be programmed more often by broadcasting companies. In fact, doing so can be beneficial in numerous ways. The most crucial advantage is that this will stimulate more women to work out, particularly those who feel that exercising is not feminine (adj.). This will not only benefit women's physical health, it will also have optimistic results on their mental wellbeing. Another positive outcome is that this will motivate/ inspire women to become professional in the field of sports, whether as players or coaches. All things considered, increasing the showtime for women's sports programs will benefit society in a long run.

In conclusion, although it is undeniable that it is difficult to imagine a world where women are equally represented as men in the sports industry, I am of the opinion that society can reap great benefits from the growth of women's sports programs both on social media and conventional media.
